to many people, education is nothing but responsibilities and nothing but a "must-do-thing" but those people don't realize that there are many children on the third world countries that YEARN to study. in this country, the education from maybe, grade school to high school is mostly free(public schools) and it's a very great opportunity to learn something new; to hone the knowledge of young minds. the problem is that many teenagers nowadays care more about material things and about having money to do this and do that at their leisure. they dont realize the opportunity they have because they're blinded by man privileges. its as if for them, education is just one of the choices they have to make - well, it is but the problem is that they see it as a second or even third choice to do just because they think that it will always be there when and if they decide to leave it behind; it's as if they could just take the opportunity back whenever they wish to have it back.

i mean, i am a teenager myself so i really can't say much but the observation i have. it is a little opinionated but there are things that should be based on opinions so many people can start seeing other's perspective of things. and so, this "article" if you will, might be opinionated-biased, but, it's only MY opinion and im not asking anyone to agree with me; im merely asking people to at least see it in different views.

third world countries such as countries in Asia yearn to be educated, to have the knowledge to grow and to have the opportunity to be someone and to go somewhere. children's dreams are to finish college and to have degrees. the truth of the matter is that children, or people in general that are less privilege appreciate more things than the people that has almost every opportunity and luxury in front of them.

so why take for granted education? why say, "i don't care anymore" and why give up? there are so many opportunities in front of our eyes. so many freedom to do what we want and so many freedom to be who we want to be.

luxury of the body is nothing compare to the "luxury" of the mind _hence broadening the knowledge, and honing skills to have better future.

teenagers, should consider going through the future and what might happen when and if they take for granted education's am not saying that sometimes i dont jump into conclusions or sometimes i dont care about consequences i am merely saying that when it comes to education maybe think twice before people say...'im done'. because what good is it to have the luxury now, if in the near future, those luxuries might just vanish?

it's better to work hard and achieve more than to play and fool around then regret later.
